

Dr. Deshauer is interested in the way technology drives changes in the way mental illness is perceived. His clinical work tends to center around people who have been designated by the terms 'bipolar disorder' and 'schizophrenia'. Dr. Deshauer is the lead editor of the Medicine and Society section in the Canadian Medical Association Journal (CMAJ). He teaches residents in family medicine and psychiatry and his academic teaching experience also includes undergraduate courses in the history of science and seminars in the history of psychiatry (UCLA). In addition to specialist certification in psychiatry, his background includes an MSc in epidemiology and an undergraduate degree in philosophy. At present Dr. Deshauer is working on a multi-year research project as part of his PhD dissertation in Science and Technology Studies.